Escape from PERIL

HE forced himself to lie still, to keep his breathing deep and regular, like a man sound asleep. So far he had fooled his Indian captors completely. Twice, through slitted eyes, he had seen Many Hawks lift his head to study the white man, to assure himself that their distinguished captive was actually asleep. Each time he had forced himself to be quiet and relaxed and at last the Indian had gone back to sleep.

He was sore all over from the beating he had gotten when he was captured, but aside from bruises he was unharmed. The three Indians who had taken him were too anxious to show their prize back at their town to risk his dying now. They were, after all, the first Indians to capture the great scout, Seth Finley. It was an honor they would play to its fullest.

Seth lay motionless, taking stock of his situation. He had been following a deer trail when the three Delawares dropped onto him from a low-hanging branch. He had fought hard, but against those odds, he had no chance to escape. Now he lay beside their tiny campfire. A rawhide thong was bound tight around his waist. One end was tied to the wrist of an Indian sleeping close on his right. The other end was tied to the arm of Many Hawks on his left. At the slightest movement or effort to escape, both his redskinned captors would be awake.

"I got to get loose somehow," Seth thought grimly. "I just got to. Once they get me to their town, I'm a goner."

Slowly he went back to the project he had started at the beginning. Only his thumb moved, the thumbnail grinding steadily back and forth over the rawhide. He was afraid to look, but it felt as if his sharp nail were finally digging in, cutting the thong where it circled his waist. Carefully he gripped the thong and tugged. Suddenly it parted where he had worn it almost in two and he was free.

He sat up in one swift, silent move. The two Indians who penned him snored on. The third lay just across the fire, also deep in sleep. Like a shadow Seth slid away, stepping over Many Hawks. There were three guns lying close. One of these he set aside. The other two he disarmed by prying out the flints. Then he poised, ready for flight but uncertain. Many Hawks was stirring, his breathing growing faster, as if about to awaken. If he did, Seth's chance of escape would be slim.

Suddenly he made up his mind. Carrying the two useless guns, he deliberately crept back between his former captors. Kneeling he swiftly tied the cut rawhide thong through the trigger guard of each gun, knotting it securely.

He was getting to his feet again when Many Hawks awoke. He sat up, wide awake, yelling his alarm. "Paleface loose! Paleface loose!"

At the cry the other two Indians sprang up. There were yells of rage as they grabbed for their weapons and found them out of reach. The third Indian was the one who got to his feet and threw himself at Seth while the other two still clambered up.

"Come and get it," Seth invited grimly. His fist slammed out. The charging Indian ran into it. The Indian bounced backward and went down, dazed and bewildered.

Many Hawks and his companion were on their feet now and they charged at Seth. At this point everything went wrong for them. They were still tied together by the rawhide that had originally pinned Seth. Worse, that thong was now burdened with two heavy rifles, long and cumbersome.

The Indians tried to jerk apart. The effort made the two dangling guns leap up and smack them. They ran together, both charging at Seth, and the guns got between their legs and sent them both sprawling.

Seth dodged and bent to drive a furious blow at the jaw of his first opponent. That Indian sighed and collapsed. It would be at least an hour before he would be a menace to freedom.

Raging and howling, Many Hawks and his companion were trying to struggle back to their feet, hampered by the thong and the dangling guns. Many Hawks tried to reach his knife to cut them apart. His companion got the same idea at the same time. Each savage lunged in a different direction. The thong whipped tight. They both grunted at the bite of rawhide into flesh.

They stopped grunting with abruptness when Indian Scout Seth Finley waded into them with hard fists swinging. Two solid blows echoed on the still night air and two Indians collapsed, unconscious. Seth grabbed the one sound rifle and ran.

He came to a stream and waded its icy water for half a mile. Leaping out, he sprang like a mountain goat from rock to rock. A fallen tree formed his next path. A long loop of hanging vine gave him a swing that left no track. Behind him there would be hardly the ghost of a trail for the Indians to follow. By dawn he would be safe at the settlement. Next time he might not be so lucky . . . and in Indian warfare, there was always a next time!

FOR DAYS THE INDIANS HAD FOLLOWED THE FLATBOAT, WAITING FOR THE MOMENT TO STRIKE! NOW IT LAY HELPLESS, CAUGHT ON A SANDBAR IN THE RIVER! THE HANDFUL OF SETTLERS ON BOARD WERE DOOMED UNLESS JED STEVENS COULD FIND A WAY TO HALT THE DEADLY...
